

Heart Throbs of the West Vol 10

activities to conform to his time and held marvelous meetings in Salt Lake City, Ogden and Provo. Wide publicity was given to Mr. Wilson's coming and all Democrats and Republicans in the Territory were invited, indeed urged, to attend. Thousands of them did attend. That was a big boost for democracy in Utah and brought the leading Democrats much closer together.

"Upon Mr. Wilson's return to Washington he recommended to the full organization of the National Association that there be added to their Executive Committee three members, and named as suitable persons for such membership, United States Senator Stephen L. White of Los Angeles, California; Governor Robert B. Smith of Helena, Montana, and myself (Charles C. Richards, of Ogden, Utah). The association adopted the recommendation of their chairman and the three named were appointed members of the Executive Committee and we were so notified and began to serve as members of the committee.

"At a meeting of the Executive Committee held soon after my appointment, conditions in Utah were fully and fairly considered and we were very cheerfully promised every assistance the association could render us, to improve the situation, and steps were taken to put our position clearly before the Senators and Representatives who were known to be friendly to us and to secure their advice and assistance in removing the prejudice of other Senators, Representatives, and other public officials, entertained against the people of Utah."—Charles C. Richards.

WASATCH COUNTY

Wasatch County was first built as a fort and did not become a town until 1889, when Henry M. Aird was elected its first mayor. The town was given the name of Heber, after Heber C. Kimball. President Abram Hatch made an outstanding contribution to the destiny of Heber Valley, later Wasatch County. It was his lot to represent his county in the state legislature at a time when the adjoining counties of Summit and Utah were casting covetous eyes upon newly discovered mining fields just across the Wasatch county lines, and seeking to annex these areas to their own. Powerful interests were behind the "grab" and Abram Hatch fought them almost alone. When the hour of voting arrived, he knew the cause was lost, but he stood in the legislative chamber and hurled his defiance in a few quietly spoken words. "Wasatch County," he said, "takes what comfort it may in the fact that it, like the Savior, has been crucified between two thieves." It took the listeners by storm and crystalized a new sense of fairness and justice in the law-makers. Wasatch county lines remained unchanged. In 1902, Heber became a city and was to have regular city organization. Political meetings were held. James W. Clyde was elected the first mayor (1902-1904).